41.76 Such a little spideri Seen through a magnifying glass its poor little body would seem in the last stage of inaultion. But 5.53 it sat in its web and waited. "All things come," and you know how bountifully they come to the web, etc., of the waiting.

'I don't see, Paula, how you can waste your time watching that bush. Do you expect golden leaves to put out suddenly from the almost withered stalks?" "Hush," said Paula. "I want to see what comes into the parlor of this poor, hungry little spider.' And, lo, a fat wiggling thing, a thing without wings that might have helped the wiggling a bit, fell from somewhere above just into the stronghold of Paula's protego-The girl was all excitement. See," she cried, "how patience is rewarded! I shall take it for a sign and believe that the rain must soon fall, the grass grow green again, the cow yield better measure and

"And wee Nannie's fever running so low. And the flowers all promised for the next week's night when the line ball comes off at the red house. Little spider. little spider, help me pray for the good fortune that will bring things right?" And her mood changing swiftly also aread to herself, but not so that wer Nauma should hear. No one heard nor saw but the spider hidden away in the spider bush is so | and swelling, swelling, even to his lear-

from the luscious repast which the wig gling thing furnished.

Angry Margheretta had left Paula to her strango ''idle way." "Better take to her needle. She can sew when she wills, and times are growing worse and worse. I can't think what is to come of those two, 64 30 and the little one failing so fast. Whatever made them come away to this strange land to die? Father, mother and now were Nannie, for where are the wine and the broth to be got that will strengthan her to fight the lever, and Paula so herdless?" Then, relenting, "But such a brave heart,

4 55 too, and so, so beautiful!"
Paula was so hopeful, so full of her new 180 00 the night before seemed to have left no trace of weariness. She felt that her play mate, her dear little sister, must get well 40 25 She had so long withstood this fever.

And so all day she watched the cloudless sky, believing that the rain speck would come, and toward evening wee Nanna grew restless, but only for a little while. Paula, watching her, saw a sudden twitten ing of the lips and stiffening of the lips in "Margheratta," she cried, and when the nurse mother came Paula raised her hands imploringly, a dread questioning in her eyes. For Paula had seen father and mother die, and the clammy coldins which now began to creep, every slowly up wee Nannie's feet chilled also the hope in Paula's beart. 89100 The rain fell steadily for three days. Maybe it soaked down through the ground and into where the worn little body and prettily made frock were put away I came not too late to save Paula's flowers. but somehow she forgot even to look after them. The money they brought had been for wee Nannie, and now-The sun came out, and the blessoms seemed lader with jewels. Paula did not see; the teers were so thick before her eyes. But Margheretts had been into the empty larder. When the footners from the red house came down to say he wanted 16 60 all the flowers now open, and "would the the ball," two days hence, Margiagnetia gaye a ready assent. "We must live," she told Paula, and, looking at the old to s so through her tears, Paula echood wearsly; 3 20 "Yes, we must live. Oh, little sister, little sister, why could not you?" she a or cried, and, going out into the night, which was coming on, she crouched under the spider bush. When her tears were apont, she sat there still, looking up at the stars and pondering the loving words that I ther, mother and wee Namule were even now speaking of her, and she seemed to feel how they pitied har loundiness down A tiny thing crawled down har hair and around her throat. Absently she put her band to crush it. The spider seemed to spring aside, alighting upon the tack of her wrist, and as her eyes in the startights fell upon her small companion a tender recollection of how she had spoken of it to the little sister caused her toars to flow

The spider passed over a bridge of his own making back to the little corner, where he could safely blink chown upon his grieving friend, who seemed not t know that the thing best to do was still "the walt." Before the sun had power to will them Paula gathered her wealth at blooms and carried them on that morning of the ball up to the grand red house on the bill. She toiled slowly up, not nothing a tall, storn looking old man in the path confronting her until the deep tones of his voice sound ed close to her car.

"Your burden is fair to look upon and most fragrant, but in a few short hours they wither. Are they to dock the racine for tonight's empty mirth." Come assin tomorrow, young girl, and look at your garlands." And be laughed mushly as be moved aside to let her pass. Frightened and huet, Paula tightened co 00 | her hold upon her basket and spell up the path, but only for a few steps. Something seemed to turn her and load her back to the bitter old man. She lightly touched him on the arm. "I will come, sir, to morrow morning. Will you meet me here?" Something hurs you sorely that you rero upon my flowers. Oh, sir, they cannot help it any more than could my poor little spider!" She looked so tenderly brave, not shrinking from the bent brows of the hanghty, disappointed old man, only what fully regarding him. And it was so now, as so this pity for him that shone in the soft gray eyes. So long he had stood alone in his pride, steeling his heart as life's disap pointment, disgrace, death and doubt in the honor of mankind followed fast byon 4 50 his footsteps.

Wealth he had, but the fawning flattery of the eyeophant sickened him of it. The butterfly life of those about him, living in the moment, were the theme of his our stant satire, but here was this child of na ture, poor and in deep distress, and she pitted him. A memory of his own shild bood and youth, almost forgot, attract within him. The girl, almost a child looked tired. "Shall I help you earry 123 98 those?" he asked, and together these two. the hardened man of sorrow and the trou-bled young girl, bore up the path the fruits of that rain which came too late to save wee Naunie, - Washington Star.

Quite Natural-
